MY MOTHER.

Still to my cheek in dreams are pressed
Those lips that kissed me first of all,
Those eyes that watched my infant rest
In fadeless memory on me fall.

Those hands, that voice, I ne'er forget,
That smile—each look, and touch, and tone
Survives, a lingering sweetness yet;
Of the dear life that gave my own.

Her love that soothed my earliest cry
I could not thank so long ago;
Who sang my softest lullaby
I was too young and weak to know.

No wakening reason taught me then
To prize my mother at her best,
And find her most my angel when
She held me helpless on her breast.

So grew my debt in long arrears,
Till time was lent to learn her worth
Through more than fifty patient years
Beyond the morning of my birth.

Then came the change. I watched the bed
Of her who o'er my cradle smiled.
The anxious love on weakness shed
Was mine—and she was now the child.

Her weary head had done with thought,
Her weary heart with care and fear;
I kissed her, but she knew me not;
I called her, but she could not hear.

There was no pain in that farewell
For her. I bore my grief away,
And wiped the secret tears that fell
In silence with the falling day.

That evening saw her breathing cease;
And round her, as a babe caressed,
Closed soft, like hovering arms, the peace
Of Him her faith had long confessed.

O presence missed, but undestroyed!
I trace thee to the world unseen;
And love will find thee, though the void
Be wide as Heaven and earth between.

My mother still! thine image sweet
Will all my life like light stand,
And thou wilt know me when we meet
Where joy's pure sunshine has no end.
